Attitudes are Driven by Neighborhood Economic Conditions

Common expectations are that the more conservative areas of east Long Beach would be opposed, and more liberal areas of the west and north side of the City ould support an increase in the minimum wage. But, thisript the case. Instead, there are more small business owners on the west and north sections of the City opposed to the increase than on the east side of Long Beachwhere a majority support he minimum wage increase see chart below).

The north and west areas are more economically challenged and presumably the small businesses located theresare at financial risk. They would be the least able to absorb the increase in the minimum wage while the state opposition to it. This is not the case in the east parts of the City, where a majority support the minimum wage hikes and where more positive economic conditions may help them feel they can manage the new labor costs.

In sum, owners of maller businesses and thoseninore economically challenged parts of the City are most opposed to the minimum wage increases presumably because they are concerned about being able to pay for them. For possible the form of greater access to creding cash flow, and marketing to help increase revenues, shoeling thembetter manage the wage increases that are coming.
